Mr. President,

Last year, at the high-level meeting on refugees and migration, I cited the remarks of Antonio Guterres, former UN High Commissioner for Refugees, that the refugee issue is not a mere crisis of numbers but a crisis of responsibility and values.

The twin crises of refugees and migrants are a multifaceted issue in which peace and security, development and human rights are intertwined. It therefore requires a comprehensive

The Republic of Korea, the first in Asia to enact the Refugee Act, has continued to improve its refugee status determination process and facilitated better treatment for asylum-seekers. Last year, the Korean Government also launched a resettlement pilot project to actively join in the international community's burden sharing efforts.

Mr. Chairman,

Along with the high-level meeting on Syrian refugees and the World Humanitarian Summit in February and May respectively, I believe that today's high-level meeting marks the third main milestone in our search for a sustainable solution to the refugee and migrant crises.

I sincerely hope that today's meeting will effectively garner the political will necessary to tackle the most pressing challenge we face together as humanity. Thank you. /end/
