

International Labour Organization
 1946
 The International Labour Organization was established in 1946 as the successor to the International Labour Office, which had been created in 1919. It is a specialized agency of the United Nations, and its primary concern is the promotion of decent work for all people, based on the principles of social justice and fundamental rights at work.

As the Secretary-General of the only intergovernmental organization...

The ILO's work is based on three pillars: rights, employment, and social protection. It develops international labour standards, monitors their implementation, and provides technical assistance to governments, employers, and workers. The organization also promotes dialogue between the three partners of social dialogue.

The ILO's work is based on three pillars: rights, employment, and social protection. It develops international labour standards, monitors their implementation, and provides technical assistance to governments, employers, and workers. The organization also promotes dialogue between the three partners of social dialogue.

The ILO's work is based on three pillars: rights, employment, and social protection. It develops international labour standards, monitors their implementation, and provides technical assistance to governments, employers, and workers. The organization also promotes dialogue between the three partners of social dialogue.

The ILO's work is based on three pillars: rights, employment, and social protection. It develops international labour standards, monitors their implementation, and provides technical assistance to governments, employers, and workers. The organization also promotes dialogue between the three partners of social dialogue.

The ILO's work is based on three pillars: rights, employment, and social protection. It develops international labour standards, monitors their implementation, and provides technical assistance to governments, employers, and workers. The organization also promotes dialogue between the three partners of social dialogue.

As noted by many speakers today, the current crisis stems from civil wars and violent conflicts. The international community is yet unable to address and resolve them. We witness unprecedented flows of about 65 million refugees and migrants. They include both people escaping wars and those who cannot cope with autocratic rule or extreme poverty. The inter-linkages between violent extremism, fundamentalism and the scourge

"established" democracies at a time of protracted economic downturn is an indicator of