

mainstreamed its work in every part of the system. It is encouraging that it is moving with the times, and it is comforting to learn of the interest shown in the underserved does not deserve, either due to wrong expectations being placed on it by the public at large and often by Member States too, or due to outright attacks against the UN. Since its early days, the UN has been a convenient scapegoat par excellence of certain quarters, but unfortunately, these days, the CNN multiplier effect amplifies bad news manyfold and instantly project it into every living room. So we need to understand the limit of what DPI can do to counter such deliberate bad news.

Singapore stands ready to extend its continued support to the Department of Public Information.