These challenges can be met only if we enable women to build on the best this world has to offer, rather than condemn them to suffer the worst of it. That means, above all, that women must be educated and enabled to play their part in the global economy, life of their families, communities, states.

_____ and the Deputy Secretary-General for

It is also imperative to involve all actors in the implementation of the gender agenda: men and women in general, governments, parliaments, civil society — including the private sector, social partners, non-governmental organizations and international, regional, national and local institutions. We must all
