HECK AGAINST DISMAY

GENERAL ASSEMBLY, THIRD COMMITTEE

ITEM 28 (A) AND (C) ADVANCEMENT OF WOMEN

STATEMENT BY ALESSANDRA GREGG, ADVISOR

Chairperson,

From the outset, let me express our satisfaction with the new focus on the role of women. Since the creation of UN Women has brought about UN women's strong start spearheading important initiatives and we look forward to its continued success. UN Women's commitment to providing concrete and measurable results and its strengthened regional and country presence has the potential to improve the lives of millions of women.

Chairperson,

We are concerned over the race, discrimination and exclusion that we have seen in the recent events of the Arab Spring that we women are a driving force for change. Yet as some countries are transitioning, we must ensure that they do not forget the processes that their actions initiated. Actions at grassroots level, the need for equality, practices that exclude the underprivileged and the poor must be addressed. We do more to protect the rights of women to participate on equal basis in the political transition, to guarantee their right to speak their minds, and to assemble freely. The UN must support efforts to fully include poor and otherwise marginalized women in democratic processes. This General Assembly should continue to reaffirm its relevance by addressing the events occurring today. This year's Third Committee resolution on Women and Political Participation is an opportunity for it to do so.

Almost 17 years after the adoption of Security Council resolution 1325 women continue to be under-represented as strategic actors in peace processes. Women's issues receive too little or too late attention in conflict resolution processes. Women's rights and needs are therefore often not fully taken into account. Women must be fully involved from the earliest opportunity. Women's training programmes for women mediators will be a crucial step towards empowering women to participate at the decision-making level at all stages of conflict prevention and resolution. In addition, the UN must also lead by example and appoint women to key posts in mediation and other transitional processes. With regard to conflict related sexual violence, Switzerland places high hopes in the new monitoring and reporting arrangements on sexual violence in armed conflicts, as these will provide information on the number of victims, as well as information on perpetrators.

Chairperson,

Violence against women in all its forms continues to be a priority for Switzerland. This, far from being only marriage, family, gender discrimination, domestic and other forms of violence should be addressed as a matter of urgency. Not only are these violations of the rights of women, but they cause significant harm to the physical and mental health of women and constitute a major challenge for development. We fully support the Elder's initiative "Gains not losses" to foster the political will to end these violations and to remind States of their obligation to protect women from all forms of violence.

Chairperson,

Impunity not only intensifies the subordination and powerlessness of the targets of violence, but deteriorates revictimization and future acts of violence. The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) significantly advanced international law, though its recognition of sexual violence as a war crime or crime against humanity. The principle of complementarity, i.e. the joint jurisdiction of the ICC and national jurisdictions, enshrines the primacy of national jurisdictions. Efforts by the Team of Experts on Rule of Law to help strengthen domestic accountability mechanisms are a vivid example of this so-called "jurisdictional complementarity."

In investigating, prosecuting, protecting and redress measures offered to women victims of violence will have a direct effect on the prevalence rates of such violence. In formal justice systems often lack the required resources to prosecute perpetrators. A case in 2010 mobile courts in the Democratic Republic of Congo adjudicated 186 cases, 130 of which were rape cases that resulted in 95 convictions; however, numerous human rights reports continue to show that pervasive violations of the human rights of women and girls are often perpetrated with impunity. Efforts to address this challenge through justice institutions must be scaled up dramatically. In addition, victims' protection and support must be ensured so they can testify freely and without fear or retaliation.

While accountability is of paramount importance, efforts to combat impunity will ultimately depend on addressing structural discrimination, including access to justice, and ensuring the protection and legal empowerment of women. Promoting legal skills and an understanding of government, especially for poor women and those living in rural areas, will increase their confidence and the full participation of women in society and political processes.
