

Good Practices In Combating Violence Against Women In SADC Countries.^{1[1]}

By Sheillah Kanyangarara^{2[2]}

Introduction

This paper discusses practices by NGOs when working with the state as well as when working with women survivors of VAW. NGOs have been chosen primarily because as institutions, they have specifically and formally taken on the issue of VAW. While acknowledging that there are other institutions like the churches, communities, families and academics that sometimes deal with VAW, it is argued that the response of these other institutions is, however, more on an individual, case by case basis with little systematic documentation of the incidences and responses at institutional as well as individual levels. Further, it is possible to discern the individual and uncoordinated responses of the various institutions and actors through some of work of the NGOs, who have also sought to study the responses of these other actors to VAW.

The paper will focus on practice of NGOs in two respects, calls for formal recognition of VAW at state level through law reform or better implementation of existing laws and message targeting and differentiation aimed at the public in general as well as women and men separately. The local understanding of what constitutes VAW has largely shaped the practices of the organisations, which have, to a great extent adopted the definition of VAW in DEVAW, which identifies VAW as encompassing physical and sexual violence as well as economic,

local, as economic

local, as economic

local, as economic

local, as economic

local, as economic

local, as economic

separate actions specifically targeting psychological and emotional abuse as VAW at institutional level, though at individual level there are clear examples with people seeking professional psychological help. To a large extent therefore, the paper focuses on practices in relation to physical and sexual violence. At state level, a few of the SADC countries have specific legislation dealing with VAW. As yet no SADC country has a law that specifically recognises VAW as a sui generis offence or where there is, the definition of VAW is somewhat narrower, confined to physical or sexual assault^{3[3][1]}.

Formal Recognition Of VAW As A Good Practice

While interaction of NGOs with women showed a high prevalence of VAW, addressing the issue proved difficult in the absence of formal recognition dealing with VAW, especially where the state is concerned. At the same time, it is acknowledged that extra legal processes are equally critical to prevent and ultimately eradicate VAW^{5[5][3]}. The organisations strategy has shifted from mere calls for law reform to calls for better implementation of the existing laws by the police and the justice departments. In the process, NGOs have altered their relationship with the state institutions from outsiders in the process of ensuring VAW using state mechanisms to partnerships with police.

Using The Law As A Tool

The law and the police play a significant and recognisable source of coercive authority^{6[6]}. Under colonial rule, police and the Native Commissioners were the visible forms of control, while the law was the invisible source of authority, in administrative systems that were faced with stiff resistance to settler rule. Colonial administrative structures placed the police as initial points of contact between citizens and the state particularly in urban areas. In rural areas, Native commissioners, working with traditional leaders, were the points of contact between the state and the citizenry. Though the role of Native Commissioners receded and other administrative structures have since been developed in the post-colonial era, the position and perception of the police has hardly changed^{7[7]}. Outside the family, the Police are therefore usually the survivors of violence's first point of contact with the state in their search for redress or protection^{8[8]}. Unfortunately, women's experience at police stations showed that, in the case of VAW, unlike in other instances, the police were not protectors and enforcers of law but co-conspirators because of their inaction or by citing absence of the law to deal with the issue.

^{5[5][3]} A Armstrong" Women as victims: A study of Rape in Swaziland" in A Armstrong & W Ncube Women and Law in Southern Africa Zimbabwe Publishing House 1987 255

^{6[6]} Cognisance is taken of the various theories on the role of the law and the state. In particular, C Mackinnon's observation in "Feminism, Marxism Method and State: toward Feminist Jurisprudence," Journal of Women in Culture and Society pp 642 that feminist theory of the state oscillates between liberal theory and theft theory, both of which treat law as the mind of the society. The liberal theory treats the state as a neutral arbiter while the left treats the state as an instrument of dominance and the law as a legitimising ideology.

^{7[7][4]} In an effort to divest themselves of the perception as forces of coercion, a number of police institutions have sought to transform themselves from "police forces" ~~to~~ ^{to} ~~the~~ ^{the} vices

Strategies adopted

Acknowledging the authoritative position of the police and potential impact of the use of law but faced with the negative experience that women faced at the hands of the police, NGOs sought to address the source of negative attitudes of the police as well as the excuses of lack of legal basis on which to act against perpetrators of VAW. In workshops, letters and papers lobbying parliament, they addressed issues of constitutional responsibility of the Police to citizens in the light of expectations of women in relation to VAW. At regional and local level, the NGOs have systematically and repeatedly undertaken an assessment of existing laws that protect women, in a bid to dispel the view that the police cannot act because the law does not allow interference in “domestic” matters. Notable amongst these efforts are the works of WLSA^{9[9]} and WiLDAF^{10[10]}, both regional bodies working on women’s rights. WLSA commissioned country researches into experiences of women with the law and part of that research covered an analysis of laws that have a bearing on women’s safety from violence within the home^{11[11]}. WiLDAF has focussed on violence against women and inheritance and has commissioned research on Femicide and the implementation of the SADC addendum Prevention and Eradication of Violence Against Women. At national level, local NGOs have assessed the prevalence of violence against women, laws that apply to VAW and they have brought these laws to the attention of the responsible authorities. Notable amongst the organisations are the White Ribbon Campaign in Namibia, Musasa Project in Zimbabwe and Women’s voices in Malawi amongst others.

The organisations have used the findings of their research to inform their engagement with state officials, highlighting the extent of the problem and shortcomings in the state’s response. The information has been used as a basis for workshops with the police, preparation of modules for training of cadet police officers and prosecutors on the national laws on VAW as well as ^{9[9]} Women and Law in Southern Africa is an action oriented research organisation operating seven SADC countries. At country level, the organisation has a core group of a minimum of six research associates diverse professions. Every three years themed research on women is coordinated at regional level and conducted at country level with financial assistance mainly from DANIDA.

^{10[10]} A regional network of NGOs working on women and law with country offices

^{11[11]} Under the research WLSA has published the following on violence and access to justice No safe place Incest and defilement in Botswana WLSA Botswana 2002, Gender Violence the invisible struggle: responses of the justice delivery system in Zambia WLSA Zambia 2001, Joy or Despair, Women and gender generated reproductive crimes of violence WLSA Zimbabwe 2001, In the shadow of the law: women and Justice delivery in Zimbabwe WLSA Zimbabwe 2000 and Struggling over scarce resources: Women and maintenance in Southern Africa WLSA 1992 lobbying parliament, with the objective of changing attitudes as well as equipping the police with legal knowledge to act in the case of VAW.

Indicators of success

The process of research as well the dissemination of the findings of the research have contributed significantly to raising awareness in relation to women's concerns on the question of violence perpetrated against them. At local level, attitudes to women clients who suffer from violence have reportedly improved. Police stations have appointed counselling officers who are dedicated to dealing with VAW.^{12[12]} Other benefits have been a general increase in awareness on the existing laws that can be used to empower the police or challenge their inaction, identifying gaps in the laws, forging relationships between the NGOs and in particular the police.

At regional level, the efforts by NGOs culminated in the adoption in 1998, by SADC heads of state, of an addendum to the SADC Declaration on Gender-the Prevention and Eradication of violence against women. The regional forum plays an influential role in ensuring state compliance with regional instruments and adoption of a declaration addressing VAW is an important step^{13[13]}. The Addendum identifies VAW as an impediment to sustainable development in SADC countries. It also recognises VAW as a violation of women's human rights that reflects the unequal relationships between men and women and which results in domination of women by men. Such concessions, at head of state level, give the struggle against VAW huge momentum that should translate into positive government action. These concessions are also important in that they translate the struggle against VAW from a women's struggle to state struggle, creating a basis for inclusion of VAW as a specific budget item under state programmes^{14[14]}. The Addendum seeks to concretise state action against VAW through providing for clear steps that need to be taken by various state departments to tackle VAW^{15[15]}. Budgetary allocations are an example of such concrete steps, which would ensure sustainability of programmes on VAW, which are almost exclusively funded by aid agencies. WILDAF and its ^{12[12][8]} In Zimbabwe there are Community liaison officers at every station, in Zambia there is a Community services department under which falls a Victim Support Unit. In South Africa National Instructions (7/1999) highlight police duties when dealing with survivors and penalise non-compliance by officers.

^{13[13][9]} Recent events in Zimbabwe, where the country was at pains to demonstrate compliance with SADC guidelines on Elections, highlight the significance of the bloc in relation to local matters.

^{14[14]} Article 24 SADC addendum requires states to allocate the necessary resources to ensure implementation and sustainability of programmes aimed at addressing VAW.

^{15[15]} Articles 8 to 15 provide for legal, social, economic cultural and political steps to be taken, while 16 to 23 provide for alterations to service provision and integrated approaches partners are currently monitoring the implementation of the declaration at country level. Research undertaken between 2003 and 2004 showed that SADC member countries have taken some steps towards implementation.^{16[16]} At its workshop held with partners in October 2004, WiLDAF resolved to research into the extent of allocation of resources to dealing with violence against women.

Critical Success Factors

In order to succeed in getting state buy-in into the campaign against VAW, it was necessary to create conditions for openness as well as the reception of the message that NGOs had to present. NGOs realised early on that a confrontational approach in which they would demand action by the state officials could be counter productive. For example, in 1995, Musasa Project ran a serialised television documentary that was highly critical of men and the state to which there was a public backlash that necessitated revision of content and approach without compromising the message that VAW against women is wrong. As a strategy therefore, NGOs positioned themselves as partners with the police services and not critics, in ensuring that women are given empathic reception at police stations. Recognising the police as a hierarchical and bureaucratic organisation, both the ministers and Police headquarters were engaged. Senior police officers then permitted (ordered) access to police stations. Officers in charge of stations were also invited to workshops and eventually modules for training of cadet police were written^{17[17]}, resulting in institutional training on addressing of the issue of VAW as opposed training through workshops, which had proved unsustainable due to the high costs involved.

The creation of ministries responsible for women's affairs or gender units within state administration has also helped accelerate recognition of VAW as a cause for concern, demanding proactive state action. NGOs have worked closely with these departments as well as parliamentarians, lobbying for condemnation of VAW, enactment of laws and implementation of exiting ones.

^{16[16][10]} Findings of the research are presented in "Using a sub-regional instrument to combat violence against women and Children: A look at the SADC Addendum and strategies for making it a reality" WiLDAF 2004

^{17[17][11]} Holding a certificate of attendance at Musasa Project's workshop on Violence against women works favourable for officers who seek transfer to court duties

The general background of increased civil society demands for state accountability cannot be underestimated in creating an enabling environment where those dealing with VAW have been able to access senior government officers.

Message Targeting as a good practice

NGOs have complemented their work with state departments by raising awareness, at community level and individual level, of the wrongfulness of VAW as a violation of women, as a violation of the law as well as a restraint to the social and economic well being of families. The electronic and print media, advertising on billboards, buses and workshops have been utilised to target different messages at different sectors of the community, after a realisation that the one size fits all approach is not likely to achieve reduced and eventual cessation of violence against women. At community level, the sixteen days of activism against VAW have been consistently commemorated from 25 November to 10 December, to extensive media coverage. Linkages have been forged with different media channels to cover commemorative activities.

Initially workshops were undertaken with a women only audience, highlighting their rights to freedom from violence. The workshops also highlighted the procedure to take in the event of violation. It was noted that, while the workshops contributed to breaking cultural attitudes of acquiescing to violence through silence, the women as the people experiencing the negative impact of violence, fully appreciated the wrongfulness of the violence. What the women did not know was either how to avoid the violence or stop the violence without breaking the marriage, particularly in view of the act that the Police were insensitive and unwilling to pursue issues of VAW. It is then that NGOs addressed women's experiences at police stations.

With time it was noted that men as potential perpetrators needed to be targeted, with a different message. It was noted that conveying the message that violence would harm the victim was likely to be ineffective because inflicting harm might, in fact, be the intention of the perpetrator^{18[18]}. For such a person therefore the message had to be that the law would be unsympathetic to a violator. Other messages sought to address the perception of violence as an indication of masculinity highlighting that “real men do not beat women.” Getting the adequate number of men to attend workshops, addressed by women, proved problematic. Men, unlike women were normally in formal employment so they were unable to attend workshops. It is then that creative partnerships with the print and electronic media were established, to ensure coverage of issues of VAW with a view to highlighting the consequences of violence on the perpetrator, especially where there is imprisonment. Women media practitioners held workshops with NGOs to train them on selling stories to newspapers or making women make the news. In addition, NGOs criticised lenient sentences through writing to Chief Magistrates, or commentary in the media, and in some instances there have been public demonstrations against particularly violent crimes.

^{18[18]} S. Mahere Director Musasa Project in interview on Strategies to combat violence

Some examples of messages targeted at men

“Wanted: who know that women are not for beating” and “men you can stop domestic violence and HIV

Indicators of Success

Using the media as a barometer for community intolerance of VAW, increased coverage as news items has been taken as a positive step. There are a number of men’s organisations seeking to influence other men to desist from perpetrating violence. An increased number of women have approached the courts seeking peace orders against perpetrators and there have been arrests of men violating such peace orders.^{19[19]}

Critical Success Factor

The message targeting is dependent on the medium of convergence as well as attitudes of the police and court officials. The media is constantly sensitised to the wrongfulness of violence against women. At present Gender Links, a South African based NGO focussing on gender equality in and through the media works closely with regional bodies and local NGOs to focus on the implementation of the SADC Addendum on VAW.

^{19[19]} Forum Mulher reports increase in number of cases attended

Apart from the efforts by NGOS, the general prevailing environment on the need to end poverty through the pursuit of sustainable development as well as the increase in appreciation of respect of human rights of all people through the work of various actors has been

Violent Act	Institutions targeted and objective	Intervention	Method	Critical success factors
	Police –law enforcement Court –Implementation of the law	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> ▪ Education on laws and attending to reports of VAW 		